It emerged against the historical backdrop of the recently independent states in Africa and Latin America and the emergent states of Asia, as well as a range of justice-making projects that include nonjudicial truth and reconciliation commissions, reconfigurations of traditional justice mechanisms, and other international criminal tribunals and courts. But what is important is that this articulation of criminal responsibility in the defence of the victim has had the opposite of its intended effect by producing what Jacques Raniciere 2004 has called disembodied political subjects that allow agency to be reassigned to the institutionally powerful in their name. Specific facts can and often do drastically change legal results.
