Labour motion on private school quotas aims at HE ‘structural change’

But once seated, his mind would whirl, with talk of closed-door meetings with Cameron or Putin. At another meeting, our Policy Officer, Maha Younes, spoke about working in the NHS and helped shape an excellent resolution to the National Policy Forum. That's all before you get into the legal thicket of redistributing assets and endowments.

Labour 'hypocrites' vote to abolish private schools

In fact, however, it was actually to amalgamate private schools with state schools, pooling resources, and providing equal access for education to all children and young people.

Labour votes to abolish private schools at party conference

The universities have dangerously over-expanded while also perfecting the art of teaching their students that the West is based on exploitation, patriarchy and other injustices.

Labour Party Conference 2019: all policy announcements assessed from scrapping private schools to Brexit

There have been two occasions, in 1986 and 2018, when Labour won more votes than the Tories but still had fewer councillors, and thus did not win control of the Council. The Labour Against Private Schools campaign — which is using the Twitter handle AbolishEton — is trying to drum up support among constituency branches.

Labour conference passes motion against private schools

Architects turning to private-sector clients is the obvious, indeed inevitable, result of government education policy. Every family with school-aged children would be affected if independent schools were abolished. More than a few of my friends went to fee paying schools, some parents were very comfortable working in the usual professions, many were teachers, police inspectors, builders who gave up a huge amount financially I am not sure how parents crippling themselves financially so their children are not disadvantaged is an argument in favour of private schools. Beyond all this, my main reason for wanting to abolish private schools is that a universal system will be far better if everyone has to use it.

Internal report lays bare poor handling of complaints by Labour

Each Saturday and Sunday with the help of a number of key BLP members, we marshalled 100s of activists into prepped and briefed canvassing teams. The Labour Party nevertheless may be acting rationally in acting as it is: Mr Corbyn is a harbinger of things to come rather than a relic of the 1960s. A more radical approach might be to compel private schools to take, as their 25% quota, children who have been on free school meals for an extended period of time, children who have been in care, or children who struggle to reach basic levels of attainment.

Labour would 'scrap discount business rates for private schools and charge VAT on fees', according to leaked document

The old community space under Arthur Court has been closed for years, following a series of leaks and the Queenstown Councillors are arguing that this space or something similar should be invested in and opened up for the benefit of the estate. Yet bold though the policy prescription drafted by campaigners is, it is unlikely to be adopted in full.

The only way to end the class divide: the case for abolishing private schools

At a time of growing divides and damaging inequality, we urgently need public institutions that bring the nation together, not further separate and divide us. Dragging everyone down to the same level is never going to be the same as investing to get those who aren't achieving as well to move UP their standards.
