In 1879, priests were excluded from the administrative committees of hospitals and boards of charity; in 1880, new measures were directed against the religious congregations; from 1880 to 1890 came the substitution of lay women for nuns in many hospitals; in 1882, the were passed.

Liberalism and radicalism in France

It is true that the Monarchists still continued to have some following but they did not count much on account of their dissensions. The result was that Delcasse, the French Foreign Minister, recalled the French ambassador to the Vatican.

The History of France from 1870 to 1914

The Radicals tended to be more statist than most European liberals, but shared liberal values on other issues, especially support for individual liberty and secularism, while the Republicans were keener on economic liberalism than secularism. That was due to the industry, patience and devotion of Delcasse.
