Panels with polyurethane foam core and plain weave carbon fabric laminated face-sheets were subjected to low-velocity impact with hemispherical steel impactors of different diameters at various energy levels. The foam core was modeled as a crushable foam material.

Damage modelling for a laminated ceramic composite

The contact force, displacement and dissipated energy of different impactors are compared. The internal and external damage of pultruded composites was analysed to compare the failure mechanisms, including matrix cracking, delamination, and fibre breakage, as functions of the initial impact energy.

Impact dynamics and damage in composite structures

This is not personal uncertainty, but lack of clarity because of physical damage to the manuscript or a low quality image.

Impact dynamics and damage in composite structures

Even if the damage morphologies are very different, the study shows that, in both cases, classical global buckling of the plate and local buckling of the delaminated sublaminae are accompanied by a crack on the impact face of the laminate. Furthermore, an analysis of the repartition of absorbed energies is done, which shows that the most efficient mechanism is the localized crushing in the 0° plies.

Experimental evidence suggests that the trends provided by the methodology are accurate and thus very helpful for studies on damage resistance and tolerance, as well as for future model designs and experiments in composite structures. Please do not abuse notes. It is well known that composite structures are neither impact damage resistant nor impact damage tolerant.
