Preface to Peasantry: A Tale of Two Black Belt Counties (Poverty, U.S.A.: the .. 9780405031212

Arguing that the plantation system had taught African Americans only dependence and irresponsibility, Raper warned that, without social programs that materially altered the South's racial and economic policies, the course of events in Greene County and similar communities would drive African American tenant farmers and sharecroppers into a permanently subjugated peasant class. Generally the term is applied to a larger region than that defined by its geology. They had almost complete control of local government.

In addition to a variety of businesses, cotton warehouses, livery stables, and hotels, the bustling city possessed one of the first banks, as well as the earliest public schools in the area, including Lumpkin Academy. For the revolutionary union movements and shopfloor radicalism among black workers in the 1960s and 1970s, see Heather Thompson, Whose Detroit? A social scientist and public intellectual, Arthur Raper 18991979 advocated unpopular solutions to combat the shortcomings of race relations and economic stagnation in the South. Annual celebrations include the Festival of Camellias, the Crape Myrtle Festival, the Beaver Creek Festival, and the Oglethorpe Fall Festival.

Instead, the local congregation selected and ordained ministers on the basis of their religiosity and ability to articulate God's word. Every few weeks the churches held trials of their own members for sins such as drunkenness, dancing, or adultery; the usual participant punishment was humiliation or expulsion from the congregation.

Black Belt in the American South

The result was to shift political power toward the more populated and industrialized urban areas.

Preface to peasantry (1936 edition)

Tenants could not repay the storekeepers. The result of a seven-year investigation into social problems stemming from African American emigration from the rural south and the resulting turnover in farm tenancy, Raper's work focuses on the agricultural depression of Greene County, Georgia, bereft of departing black sharecroppers, and the contrasting economic stability of Macon County, Georgia, where the population had gone without significant upheaval.
