What the above quote does not state clearly though is that the Yilanè are dinosaur people! Well, this book has all of that, and more; an entire appendix chock full of zoology and cultural anthropology and even a description of two entirely thought-out and made-up languages.

West of Eden (West of Eden, #1) by Harry Harrison

But here, we have the roots of what became a certain type of Los Angeles culture. So, dinos who can create a genetically modified creature to exude a single molecule in the shape of a collar for a prized prisoner don't know even the most basic things about fire.

It may be my nature but I find the obscure always the most interesting. Floating like well-appointed yachts on the glittering sea of that surface are a quintet of wealthy Los Angeles families - four famous, one not. A year after this book was published, at the age of eighty-three, Jean Stein fell from the fifteenth floor of her Upper East Side apartment building in New York.
