Lincoln's election, however, proved to be the icing on the southern secession cake. For example, in exploring how a conflict began, one side may talk about its origins being buried in the mists of time before there were boundaries and roads and written laws. In the 1950s, a sociologist named Maurice Duverger theorized that in a winner-takes-all political system, a multiplicity of viewpoints will tend to condense into two major parties.

In the homelands of the Nisqually, Puyallup, and Muckleshoot peoples, located in the central Puget Sound region of Washington State, men, women, and children risked all they had to force the State to uphold the treaties. There are many variations on these starting points, and they are outlined in detail in the topic.
