From 'Pauline' Poem by Robert Browning

Educated largely at home, Browning as a young man read and traveled widely. The Brownings moved to Italy shortly after their honeymoon, settling in Florence.

As civilization goes on, imagination will not fall into disuse, but will reach a higher development. In this matter of melodious expression, the poets differ more than in almost anything else. This scarce antiquarian book is a facsimile reprint of the original.

1850 in poetry

Originally Browning considered Pauline as the first of a series written by different aspects of himself, but he soon abandoned this idea.

Robert Browning, poet and philosopher, 1850

I wish to speak of this same poem as embodying the true idea of inspiration, and so in general, of the communications of God to man.

Human Imperfection and Browning's Philosophy of Life

Whatever the student of literature may think of Browning, he must take account of the fact that never before was there a writer of verse for the study of whose writings during his life-time clubs were formed in every large city of both hemispheres — the proceedings of some of these clubs being regularly published, like the transactions of learned societies.

Robert Browning, poet and philosopher, 1850

Or decomposes hut to recompose, Itecome my universe that feels and knows. Seventhly, what the young wife herself said, during the short hours between the attack and her death—1,800 lines.
