Krige, Eileen Jensen

Apart from the lack of insight into the extent to which psychology is a product of the culture which gave it birth and provided the framework for its development, the lack of awareness in the discipline is especially noticeable with respect to the values it claims to be free of, but nevertheless, subscribes to. Tony Platt's 1969 influential study of the juvenile court movement argued that the Protestant, upper-class Republican women who led the movement sought to advance the interests of their sex and class, rather than those of the Catholic and Jewish working-class immigrant children they said they wanted to help.
