Discover Physics

The societies and academies provided the principal opportunities for the publication and discussion of scientific results during and after the scientific revolution. See also: At the end of the 19th century, physics had evolved to the point at which could cope with highly complex problems involving macroscopic situations; thermodynamics and kinetic theory were well established; geometrical and physical optics could be understood in terms of electromagnetic waves; and the conservation laws for energy and momentum and mass were widely accepted.

All Nobel Prizes in Physics

So another way to answer your question is: Everyone invented physics. This impossibility only slowly disappeared as experimental practice became more widespread and more refined in the early years of the 19th century in places such as the newly established in London.
