Reminiscences Of Georgia (1850) by Emily P. Burke

. I remember one old building in particular, that had not been altered or repaired for more than half a century. Though nature was not silent, her voice was not the hum of a busy world, but a sublime anthem, sung as a prelude to the worship of this holy day, in which the lowing cattle made sweet harmony with the songsters of the groves, while the ocean's loud peal formed the bass to the whole; and even the flowers, whose language is that of the deaf and dumb, seemed to lift up their heads and smile a welcome to the coming Sabbath.

Teachers in the languages, music and the other sciences, received good salaries, and while I was there, the master of this plantation, anxious to live independent of all the world, was endeavoring to make such arrangements that he could have his own church and chaplain. Accordingly, Peggy and Van Buren were soon saddled and waiting our pleasure before the gate.

Holdings: Reminiscences of Georgia

There, beyond the bar, the eye rests upon the noble ship that first was launched in British seas, lying at ease in all her proud majesty, unmoved and as little heeding the movements of all smaller barques, as the lordly nabob revelling in wealth and luxury, does the every day events of a laboring world. In one of those rooms I found a very pretty female, in whom I soon became much interested.
