The Higher Education White Paper: the good, the bad, the unspeakable

The first is the question of how many different stakeholders are involved in decision-making about educational reforms as well as day-to-day management of education systems this might be called the horizontal governance dimension. Decisions with regard to structural quality are political decisions macrolevel that have corresponding effects on quality of orientation at the mesolevel of educational institutions and process quality at the microlevel, educators.

The Netherlands : from corrective to facilitative governmental policies (1991)

Hence, it is a good example how complex governance arrangements in the global era are both necessary as well as possible.

Chapter 19

Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press. Disparities are also seen in learning outcomes.

Is Europe Passé?

Moreover, the meritocratic role of higher education is waning in Anglo-American societies with neoliberal policies that became significantly more unequal in terms of income from labour and notably from capital. Policymakers and teachers can embrace its potential to uphold rights, encourage critical thinking and democratic exercise, and support the development of love for learning.
