Identifying the effect of mobilization on voter turnout through a natural experiment

We study this by leveraging a natural experiment in Japan, in which the timing of a municipal election is as-if-randomly assigned. James Brown

Scott New York: Oxford University Press, 1916 , 154f. We argue that some unique settings in Japan allow us not only to mitigate omitted variable bias but also to attribute the estimated effect only to mobilization, rather than the effects of cost sharing and psychological stimulus.
