In addition, we need to understand how the impact of structural and cultural factors can create individual problems and difficulties for older people. For example, changes in kidney and bladder function are commonly experienced.

Social Work with Older People

As Whittington 2003 points out, it should not blithely be assumed that the development of closer collaborative working will necessarily, in and of itself, be a good thing — either for service users or for social workers.

Social Work with Older People

While people have many motivations for carrying out a caring role — reciprocity, obligation, expectation, lack of alternatives, etc. With regard to practice with older people, therefore, the way in which social work has progressed should not be separated from the development of other related occupations — of which nursing, medicine, occupational therapy and physiotherapy are particularly important.

Arguably, these trends have made social work with older people into a particularly dispiriting enterprise for many practitioners Carey, 2003; Postle, 2002. These will be discussed more fully in Chapter 7. The Place of Older People in Social Work Community Care — a Revolution in Practice? The experience of any cognitive impairment — particularly dementia — is acutely distressing for all concerned, requiring a high level of skill on the part of all practitioners involved.
