A critical discourse analysis of New Zealand government policy: Women as mothers and workers

Developmental trends in how children acquire and appropriate school-based narrative styles and conventions through their dialogues and joint activity with adults in school-like learning activities and conversations have been well documented in the developmental psychology literature Cochran-Smith, 1983; Snow, 1989. According to Gokhale 1995 , individuals are able to achieve higher levels of learning and retain more information when they work in a group rather than individually, this applies to both the facilitators of knowledge, the instructors, and the receivers of knowledge, the students.

Is the care

Increasing culture-comparative research in international journals of behavioral development reflect such convergence.
