Urban mobility at a tipping point

These greater distances between residences and needed facilities can only be covered by those with motorised transport.

Urban Business Area Traffic and Parking Problems Solutions

In addition, road congestion in the neighborhood which affects the commuting costs of local residents depends on the average amount of off-street parking per dwelling, an externality that is ignored by profit-maximizing developers, making the equilibrium inefficient. Since every location is unique, this ensures job security for planners who can help communities to develop integrated parking management programs.
