Fables by the late Mr. Gay. (1801 edition)

Le premier tome est paru pour la première fois en 1727, une suite lui fut ajoutée en 1738. A Crow, who had built her nest in a cedar near the foot of the rock, observing what passed, was ambitious of performing the same exploit; and darting from her nest, fixed her talons in the fleece of another lamb. We hope to live to a good old age: Should we not, then, lay up a store of conveniences against that time, when we shall be most in want of them, and least able to procure them? And if so, how inexcusable shall we be, if we defer the execution of it till the alarm comes upon us.

Fables : Gay, John, 1685

The drift of this fable is to tell us, that good books and good thoughts are the best company, and that they are mistaken, who think a wise man can ever be alone.

Never were two creatures better together than a Dog and a Cat brought up in the same house from a Whelp and a Kitten; so kind, so gamesome and diverting, that it was half the entertainment of the family to see the gambols and love-tricks that passed betwixt them.

George Bayntun

The Wolf, an ill-natured and malicious beast, seized this opportunity to accuse the Fox of pride, ingratitude, and disaffection to his majesty.

The Project Gutenberg eBook of Bewick's Select Fables of Æsop and others, by Æsop.

With 66 fables, in the 2 parts. The Stag looking into the Water. A Spider that observed a Swallow catching of flies, fell immediately to work upon a net to catch Swallows; for she looked upon it as an encroachment upon her right: but the birds, without any difficulty, brake through the work, and flew away with the very net itself.

Fables By The Late Mr. John Gay. by John Gay

Experience makes many a wise man of a fool, and security makes many a fool of a wise man. A Lion and a Tyger jointly seized on a young fawn, which they immediately killed. It will then be my interest to warn you of anything that may obstruct your way; your feet shall be my feet, and my eyes yours.
