Arctic Shorebirds in North America by Jonathan Robert Bart, Victoria Helen Johnston

Most bird migration in this hemisphere is closely tied to this green wave, which brings an abundance of insects, especially caterpillars. Cooperative international partnerships are the key to preserving migration corridors.

Biogeographical profiles of shorebird migration in midcontinental North America

This spring, Princeton University Press added a new field guide for shorebirds: , by Richard Chandler. Pirie and Johnston, this volume, chapter 10 addresses this issue for one such species, the Whimbrel, by comparing results from aerial and ground surveys.

Of the eight species of nesting shorebirds, only the Piping Plover and Upland Sandpiper are species requiring protective measures. This book goes into great details, describing the individual species and their races. Therefore, shorebirds often concentrate in extremely large groups at distantly separated wetlands.

Biogeographical profiles of shorebird migration in midcontinental North America

With the addition of 4 new sites in September 2000, the number of officially designated sites in the system stands at 46, responsible for managing over 20 million acres in 7 Western Hemisphere nations. Goal areas were all relatively large and although individual islands might be small they were grouped into chains, such as the Hawaiian Islands, more than 1000 km long. Birdwatchers revel in these events known as fallouts.

Shorebird Migration

A prototype Citizens Manual for Maryland is already complete. The Monte Cristi wetlands in the Dominican Republic are an important site for Black-necked Stilts, with large numbers repeatedly observed 5,480; 1,986; 1,732; This might be due either to birds flying above the range of visual detection or to the lack of shorebird migrations during the 10 day transit of the area.

Migratory Bird Initiatives

These declines have resulted in a number of North American taxa receiving protected status under the U. Current work suggests that some species may even exceed 8000 km non-stop flights over open ocean.
