Liberation Theology

The biblical story of Hagar inspires black women to claim their theological voices to articulate the meaning of the faith and to live it out courageously. In spite of these offenses, many Native American people adapted to Christianity over the centuries and became members of Christian churches. Sin involves the assertion of the superiority of whiteness over blackness, and critical engagement is necessary to deconstruct the racism that has imposed domination and perpetrated oppression in the church through structures such as separatism and subordination.

It critiques society and ideologies sustaining it, pretends not to lay down specific rules for how to struggle for justice, but stresses that a responsible commitment with class conflict is an expression of love for one's neighbor. Of course, the full radicalism of what is needed is still not understood.
