Sono Koi, Seiritsu Naru ka (Title)

During times of unrest and famine in the early medieval period, aristocrats entrusted valuables to merchants with storehouses, usually moneylenders, and to temples that also had storehouses.

Antarah ibn Shaddad

Hyūga then walks over telling Hanamiya that he shouldn't forget what he did last year, with Hanamiya questioning his actions. They are called commoners, as opposed to the elite recipients of those taxes, including temples, shrines, aristocrats, and warriors.

and He also mentions Al nafs al mut'ma'inna Archives

Indeed, 1,680 kanmon at most was a more likely figure for the annual income, if the levels indicated in this document were attained every month.

Seirin High vs Kirisaki Daiichi High

Excluded by the ancient civil law code from most aspects of public life, including even from rosters of land and business holdings, women may have thereby been as much freed to pursue mercantile activities as restricted from other activities. Already in the late Heian period aristocratic families and religious institutions in Kyoto had become the overlords of nonagrarian occupational groups of merchants and craftsmen. Hanamiya is angered by Kiyoshi's niceness and swears loudly.

Antarah ibn Shaddad

One day, you find it and you want to show it to Kaito, but maybe a little peek won't be so bad.

Seirin High vs Kirisaki Daiichi High

Later on, Rantaro starts growing fond of Kokichi; maybe this way Kokichi's life won't be so dark anymore. He did not like wet weather, whether it be a cloudburst or a light sprinkle. Guilds no longer conformed to the neat design of early times, if indeed they ever had.

Saihara Shuichi/Shinguji Korekiyo

Enforcement is a separate issue altogether, and less frequently addressed in sources.

Saihara Shuichi/Shinguji Korekiyo

This incident simultaneously calls attention to the new role of the Muromachi Bakufu as imperial protector, in effect, and to the weakness of the emperor vis-à-vis Enryakuji, whose abbot had treated the emperor with contempt by ignoring him.
