Patterns of policing and the attitudes and behaviour of police officers and immigration officers toward minoritized communities across this country are still marked by racialized beliefs and practices, resulting in the differential treatment of particular groups, such as Blacks and Indigenous peoples. This edition continues to emphasize the saliency of racism as a social marker of difference and oppression, but more examples of the intersection of racism with other forms of oppression such as gender and class are presented. The evidence of such intersectionality is seen throughout the text.
