The Ragged School Union During the 19th century many people began to worry about the neglected children and so more schools were opened.

ERIC

Detailing the policies and status of labor union education and training in Britain, especially training for union representatives and health and safety education, the author concludes that there is a massive potential demand for labor education, but that political and economic conditions are affecting such activities. Some people thought it was too big a drain on the public purse.

Hidden Lives Revealed

Some children genuinely did not know how old they were. Fareham Industrial Home The cost of the Schools Parents were supposed to contribute to the cost of keeping a child in an Industrial School. One of the earliest attempts to start an Industrial feeding School, as they were at first called, was in Aberdeen in 1846.
