Broadcasters' role during elections does not differ from their normal journalistic role during non-election periods. Prior to his death, Wallhead joined the Labour Party, so this result could be classed as a Labour hold. The media are not the sole source of information for voters, but in a world dominated by mass communications, it is increasingly the media that determine the political agenda, even in less technologically developed countries.

Media and Elections —

A range of such combinations has been used to enhance elections-related interactions, to distribute civic and voter education, and for other goals.
