Mapping Meanings: The Field of New Learning in Late Qing China (Sinica Leidensia)

Modernist's Federation and the poetry groupings which spawned it were an attempt by young poets in Sichuan to establish an open and orderly dialogue between each other within the province and, ultimately, between poets similar inclination throughout China.

After all, the Qing educational reform was launched not only in the wake of its cataclysmic defeat by Japan but also of the devastation that followed the Boxer Rebellion of 1900. For example, Japanese scholars during the early Meiji period had already in the 1860s demarcated the new sciences by referring to Wissenschaft as kagaku kexue , lit.

The new ideas injected into the Chinese cultural sphere through persistent Western imperialism during the nineteenth century provoked the collapse of the imperial order and, in turn, the transformation in Chinese historiography, but they also stimulated an internal dialogue with the indigenous historiographical tradition that was crucial in determining how the modern discipline developed. None of these endeavors could escape the fate of a futile or fatal end, leaving Mao disoriented with his belief in Marxist tenets of constant struggle. Here I will analyze six texts by two Sichuan born Tibetans, namely, Tashi Dawa and Alai, and one Han Chinese, Ge Fei.

Words and Their Stories (Handbook of Oriental Studies: Section 4 China)

Little do they know that ancient Chinese people also practiced this type of marriage. If you do not have the consciousness and the will, if you try to cover up your festering sores, then others cannot cure the rot even though they can smell it. For students of history, their subject meant much more to them than any particular sociopolitical significance.

Science and Technology in Modern China, 1880s

This area of the city, as described in the opening of North Town, is characterized by dermatitis-causing industrial pollution: Three huge chimneys were the symbol of north town.
