Rising Latino political representation: Leaders praise progress but say work to

In the long run, continuing to invest in naturalization, working to improve the registration and participation of the Latino electorate, and mobilizing a millennial generation that is eager to do battle with the forces of reaction are also key elements of building progressive power. In Alexandria City, Prince George's, Montgomery, and Prince William Counties, Hispanics are now represented on local boards and councils.

Latinos and the Future of American Politics

Pew Research Center does not take policy positions. Only about one in six employed Latinos above the age of 25 holds a college degree,<sup>4</sup> which is less than half the portion of employed whites. More than half of the appointments he's made to city commissions have gone to women, with Latinas comprising the largest percentage of women serving on boards and commissions.

Latino Political Pulse: How Hispanics Have Changed California Politics

Within states, Latinos are more likely to move within a county, indicating they are more likely to move for employment opportunities. A little kindness toward each other will go a long way in what is likely to be a season of Trump-inspired meanness. The president-elect had one: Your problems are due to unfair competition from international trade and wage-cutting immigrants.

The Lag in Latino Political Representation

In 1993, after term limits kick in, Cruz Bustamante becomes the first Latino speaker of the California Assembly in the modern era. Constitution guaranteeing equal protection of the laws and equal access to the ballot box. He served in the House from 1973 to 1976 and then moved on to the State Senate, where he represented the 28th District Wichita, Sedgwick County from 1977 to 2003.
