How come China is now boasting of how much of Tibet is locked up, thus excluding the miners, in the name of wildlife protection? There is plenty of precedent for this, in China and elsewhere. I witnessed the Tibet movement grow and grow for 20 years, and then, over the past 20 years slowly dwindle, as many supporters grew disillusioned with an issue that never seemed to progress. Every such resettlement is laid out in straight lines, always has a police station, and cameras capturing footage along the main street.

China is countries that produces it. Journalists tend to assume this has been achieved by force of personality, as if personal charisma drives historic shifts. Armed with the seductive promise of systems theory and top-level design, he persuaded other central leaders that all aspects of development planning require an integrated approach embracing the economy, culture, politics and society.

If China was solely concerned with protection of the Tibetan antelopes, it would have included their full migratory range, for a species whose pregnant females travel great distances to give birth safe from predators, across provincial boundaries beyond Qinghai, in both Xinjiang and Tibet Autonomous Region. In this article, we shall shed light on the benefits of intellectual property rights. The activities of nomadic herders are a long-standing and traditional use in the property, and has coexisted with the nature conservation values.

What are we to make of the ever expanding nature reserves? Decades ago, when almost all Chinese worked in state enterprises, each enterprise work unit maintained a thick dossier on each worker, in which the danwei work unit party cell monitored and noted the behaviours, words and attitudes of each employee. Whether continues is not the point.
