Swedish Immigration to North America

Those who struggled with farming or children of successful farmers who did not enjoy rural life sought to make a living elsewhere, often in urban areas. They then returned to Red Bud, where three more children were born.

Swedish Immigration to North America

After the Civil War, the Swedish settlements spread further west to Kansas and Nebraska, and in 1870 almost 75 percent of the Swedish immigrants in the United States were found in Illinois, Minnesota, Kansas, Wisconsin, and Nebraska. Most Swedish immigrants learned some English as was necessary for employment, and their children were instructed in the language in the public schools. Descendants settled in the United States, Tonga, Samoa, Australia and elsewhere in the South Pacific.
