Caledonia (1839 brig)

Through further investigation, Seal begins to suspect the townspeople, and chiefly the town's parson, Robert Hawker, for the Caledonia's demise on the jagged shores below. It started when a handful of protesters from the nearby Six Nations Reserve walked onto Douglas Creek Estates in Caledonia, Ontario, then a residential subdivision under construction, and blocked workers from entering. As she departed Falmouth a north-westerly gale was raging.

Caledonia (1839 brig)

He paints the vicar as a villain but on the weakest of evidence. Having meticulously researched maritime logs, broadsides of the day, and other first-hand documents, Seal weaves history, travelogue, and imaginative reconstruction in this marvelous piece of detective work, bringing us a mystery of the best kind--the sort that really did happen. Among the congregation was Nicolas Jouault, great, great grandson of Edward Le Dain, whose presence was even more remarkable than it might at first appear, since Le Dain went on to survive two further shipwrecks after his escape from the destruction of the Caledonia.

The inside pages look unmarked. It was preceded by a brief act of commemoration held at the top cliff overlooking the shipwreck site, with a piper leading the way across the fields to the Church. He also named his son Edward Robert Hawker Le Dain born in 1854, and made Hawker and his wife godparents.
