These schools, in communities where children are normally written off to lives of poverty, welfare dependency, or incarceration, already produce much higher levels of achievement for students of color, sending more than 90 percent of their students to college. Without question, each unit within the institution must understand its role in shaping an inclusive campus community. Black lives matter, and Black and indigenous people and other peoples of color—including faculty and students—have the right to thrive and not just survive.

Unequal Opportunity: Race and Education

Just as our students are more likely to engage in transformative learning when they feel a sense of connection and belonging, instructors bring our best to teaching racial justice content when we are part of a learning community that offers ongoing support, challenge, and innovation. Will we have the will and the power to create a new reality? Starting in 2007, Congress and the administration began creating more generous IDR options, which have become increasingly popular with borrowers.

Racial inequality, at college and in the workplace

The experience also underscored what we have always known—that diversity, equity, and inclusion are core to the realization of the institutional mission on each one of our campuses.

The Continued Student Loan Crisis for Black Borrowers

Racial microaggressions and difficult dialogues on race in the classroom. James Comer about the value of a systemic and developmental approach to school reform -- the ideas presented here are the foundation of the Comer School Development Program, the success of which has demonstrated the value of these ideas.
