community toward the government and subverts official government policies by intricate face-to-face mahalle-level relationships. Mahalla level state-society relationships were more complex, however, as their leaders could serve as henchmen as well as act as buffers between the local community and the state.

Mahallah

After their inclusion in the Soviet Union, informal mahalla organizations were placed under the state control and served as local extensions of the Soviet government.

Mahallah

Important community-level management functions are performed through mahalle solidarity, such as religious ceremonies, life-cycle rituals, resource management and conflict resolution. An imam is seen as the spiritual head of the mahalla.

Against the background of the ongoing migration crisis, all participants of the festival focus their work using themes of hospitality, identity formation, homelessness, migration, fluctuation, the changing of an existing order and the dissolution of borders. Mahalas are often named after the first settler or, when ethnically separate, according to the dominant ethnicity.
