The Importance of British Material Culture to Historical Archaeologies of the Nineteenth Century on JSTOR

Goods that had once been painstakingly crafted by hand started to be produced in mass quantities by machines in factories, thanks to the introduction of new machines and techniques in textiles, iron making and other industries. Spengler's cautionary remarks are revealing, and they might account for the fact that the early writers on the question of the extent of noninterventionism in nineteenth century England tended to view the period as the apotheosis of laissez faire. By 1901 there were 74 British towns which met the 50,000 minimum threshold.
