Editorial: accommodating multiple interests in local forest management

Key elements for judging fundamentally different situations are suggested. This article presents pluralism as a foundation for understanding how less powerful group's interests can be accommodated.

Forest management as political practice: Indian experiences with the accommodation of multiple interests

Abstract The authors introduce the special issue on accommodating multiple interests in forest management and provide an overview of the seven papers in the issue.

Laurent Umans

The first, intervention, is a unilaterally designed aid strategy where the external intervening party takes the lead, sets goals, draws up plans, etc.

Editorial: accommodating multiple interests in local forest management

This paper examines several issues of pluralism in the economics of SFM, principally: i) multiple forest uses under extended forest rotations, ii) the panarchy framework, and iii) the stakeholder's approach. Facilitation strategies should be defined according to the type of situation the stakeholders are in. The merits and limitations of these approaches are discussed.

Laurent Umans

When, if at all, is facilitation worthwhile? The conclusion is that mismatches between competent performances rather than conflicts of interests between relevant stakeholders are most involved when problems arise. When, if at all, is facilitation worthwhile? The second, facilitation, is a mutually designed strategy of cooperation which focuses on collective action and mutual learning. Moreover, it should define itself within a particular context.
