Gender

For disabled women with speech impairments, as often seen in cerebral palsy and other neurological impairments, it is especially important to have someone take the time to communicate with them directly and privately.

Asking right questions key to detecting abuse

Caffo E, Belaise C: Psychological aspects of traumatic injury in children and adolescents. It is essential to request and receive information specifically about women with disabilities as part of this type of training, given the many unique situations of dependence, physical limitations in self-defense, limited available helping resources, and the general lack of awareness or sensitivity to the vulnerability they face. Provide safety planning and referrals.
