The French Face of Joseph Conrad

At the beginning of the poem we see what might seem innocent enough—a stand selling wares to city dwellers out for a drive in the country. In a like manner, neither Gould the idealist, nor Decoud the sceptic, nor Nostromo the man of simple faith occupies the front of the stage for very long; for Conrad, too, is not primarily interested in individuals but in the clash of conflicting ideas and codes of conduct as they shape the course of events.
