That is to say, for as long as our culture can remember. Pyramus and Thisbe, both Babylonians, were the subject of a story by the Roman poet Ovid 43 BC-17 AD in his long poem Metamorphoses. When Aphrodite competes with other goddesses in a beauty contest—in which a golden apple is to be awarded as the prize—she bribes the judge, a young Trojan named Paris, promising him the most ravishing woman in the world, Helen, if he will select her, Aphrodite, as the most beautiful goddess.
