Asian Americans in literature

The AYPE fair itself took place in the same area that the University of Washington UW stands today. Under the Euro-centric ideals of beauty, normalcy, and way of life, Filipinos as dog eaters whether factual or not on an individual basis are considered barbaric or living a backwards lifestyle as a whole; and, for Filipino Americans who do not eat dogs, different from their ancestors in the Philippines and the Igorots that were showcased in the US World Fairs, they must still deal with the unjust extension of this stereotype upon them. In future iterations of this unit, I plan to introduce students to definitions at the beginning of the unit and return to them after students have read the texts and experienced the teaching tour.

No matter how close I get to my friends in Vietnam, there will always be a wall, a subconscious recognition that we lack a shared experience. How are negative portrayals of Filipinos eating dog meat played out in the media and how are these portrayals part of the historical process of racialization and continuance of the cultural hierarchy? Most literary critics perceive alimentary references as narrative strategies or part of the background; Xu takes food as the central site of cultural and political struggles waged in the seemingly private domain of desire in the lives of Asian Americans.
