Liberals is no reference made to the composition of the delegates. The province also employed a unique electoral system from the beginning of this study until 1996 where the province was divided into 13 districts with each riding electing a Member and a Councilman. The second set of questions looks at the process of transformation of social cleavages into political divisions.

The difference in religious heterogeneity 52 between regions remains clear while at the same time reflecting the decreasing religious membership in traditional areas and the emergence of new religious groups. The extent of this constitution's codification may in some way be related to its reputation as a populist party.

The simpler index is created by adding the inverse percentage o f the urban and rural populations. There are six charts in this chapter with categories rangingfrom the party's internal structure to the length of theconstitution, and each of these general categories is broken downinto a number of entries. Of the cleavage structure examined, ethnicity is positively correlated with party system size and the size of a province's rural population is negatively correlated with party system size.
