Building the Trident Network

The management of uncertainties within the Trident production program emerges as critical to its successful completion.

Maggie Mort

The management of uncertainties within the Trident production program emerges as critical to its successful completion. The end of the Cold War has released a flood of new archival materials and memoirs both in the former Communist world and in Western countries.

Our model finds that winning sides employ stronger arguments, and allows us to identify the linguistic features associated with strong or weak arguments. Quantified examines these and other issues that arise when biosensing technologies become part of everyday life.

Forged from a partnership between a university press and a library, Project MUSE is a trusted part of the academic and scholarly community it serves. Is this phenomenon empowering, or a new form of social control? Journal of Cold War Studies is the first peer-reviewed journal to feature research based on these new sources. InBuilding the Trident Network, Maggie Mort approaches the United Kingdom's Trident submarine and missile system as a sociotechnical network.

Drawing on the sociology of scientific and technical knowledge and on actor-network theory, Mort recounts how the Trident program was stabilized in the United Kingdom and brought into "successful" production. We propose a predictive model of debate that estimates the effects of linguistic features and the latent persuasive strengths of different topics, as well as the interactions between the two. The book offers a range of perspectives, with views from the social sciences, cultural studies, journalism, industry, and the nonprofit world.
