What to Expect

Objective jail classification OJC is a process of assessing every jail inmate's custody and program needs and is considered one of the most important management tools available to jail administrators and criminal justice system planners. While it appears reasonable to assume that inmates above a certain number of years left to serve have relatively more to gain from escaping prison, it is unclear why or how CDCR concluded that five years was an appropriate cutoff point.

Parole A supervised release granted by the Board of Executive Clemency for which statutory eligibility is usually upon completion of one-half or two-thirds of the imposed sentence; or upon completion of a mandatory minimum amount of time which is statutorily mandated. The Classification Unit itself must also be heavily centralized, so that discretionary decisions do not intrude into the process, leaving one offender with a different placement than another, even if both offenders are in reality of the same risk level.

Prison classification specialists develop an individual profile of each inmate that includes the offenders crime, social background, education, job skills and work history, health, and criminal record, including prior prison sentences. Such inaccuracy could be due to the factors discussed above that have likely caused the accuracy of the score to decline since it was first developed.
